FREE MOVEMENT OF TRANSNATIONAL CORPORATIONS WITHIN EUROPEAN UNION

Abstract
There are two types of doctrines applied by Member States to deciding the connecting factor: the real seat theory and incorporation theory. Accordingly, a decentralized nature of multinational enterprises (MNEs) involves various cross-border operations. The aim of this paper is to explore to what extent these transnational objectives of MNEs can be achieved under the freedom of establishment principle of EU law and incorporation theories of Member States.

KEYWORDS: TFEU, free movement of MNEs, transfer of registered office or real seat, incorporation theories, EU law, transnational mergers and cross-border establishment rights.

INTRODUCTION

Freedom of establishment concerning corporate mobility is embodied in Articles 49 (Ex Art.43 TEC) and 54 (Ex Art.48 TEC) of the TFEU. In particular, Article 49 states that '…restrictions on the freedom of establishment of nationals of a Member State in the territory of another Member State shall be prohibited. Such prohibition shall also apply to restrictions on the setting-up of agencies, branches or subsidiaries by nationals…' while Article 54 provides that lawfully incorporated companies in a Member State shall be treated in the same way as nationals of Member States. However, unlike natural persons who gain their nationality by default at birth, companies must comply with relevant national laws so as to acquire their legal identity (nationality) and qualify for cross-border establishment rights. Thus, Article 54 makes companies subject to national company laws of Member States, which vary from State to State and impose different conditions on companies for gaining and retaining their nationality.

Since the incorporation of companies' means is regulated by Member States, they are free to decide on the connecting factor between companies and their national territory. Specifically, Member States are unrestricted to require the presence of a particular type of seat within their territories for the incorporation of the companies and determination of the applicable law. There are two types of doctrines applied by Member States to deciding the connecting factor: the real seat theory and incorporation theory. States (nine Members) following the real seat theory require the existence of central administration while those (six Members) following the incorporation theory require the presence of registered office. Thus, when companies are involved in cross-border operations, these two conflicting theories may result in disputes with regard to the status of companies and applicable laws, thereby causing restrictions on free movement rights. In such cases, the burden of reconciling conflicting interests falls on the European Court of Justice (ECJ), which is supposed to decide the scope of freedom of establishment and define the "restrictions" made on it by national regulations. Therefore, it is essential to strike a right balance between national regulatory autonomy and free movement.

Economic globalization and regional integration made it common for companies to locate their central administration or economic activities ("real seat") in a State which differs from the State of their registration/incorporation ("registered seat"). Under EU law, companies are entitled to transfer their registered office or real seat by the right of freedom of establishment. However, the transfer of particular type of company's seat is influenced by the role that the seat in question plays in international private law and national company law of the home and host state. Specifically, company law of Member States may require liquidation of a company, which intends to transfer its real seat or registered office. In this case, question arises whether a company can invoke its right of establishment to carry out such transfers without loss of its nationality. This issue is addressed by the ECJ in Daily Mail, Cartesio and Vale cases.

Daily Mail and General Trust (DMGT) was a company incorporated in the UK, which sought to transfer its central administration to Netherlands. According to UK company law, although connecting factor for incorporation was a registered office, companies were evaluated for tax based on the place of their "central management and control". Accordingly, transfer of central management and control was allowed only with the consent of the Treasury. DMGT claimed that such a "consent" prerequisite was a restriction on its right of freedom of establishment. The ECJ decided that such transfer does not fall within the ambit of Art. 49 protection. It justified this decision by asserting that 'companies are creatures of national law and exist by virtue of the varying national legislation which determines their incorporation and functioning'. Moreover, it was clarified that due to the lack of harmonization of incorporation conditions, the issue concerning transfer of a real seat or registered office without losing nationality is not resolved by the freedom of establishment.

Later, this decision was developed in Cartesio case. Cartesio was a limited partnership incorporated in Hungary that applied for transferring its operational headquarters to Italy. However, the Hungarian Court rejected the application based on the Hungarian law which did not allow companies to move their operational headquarters to another Member State while maintaining their status as a Hungarian company. Cartesio claimed that it constituted a restriction on the right of establishment.

It was assumed by Advocates General that Hungarian law follows the real seat doctrine, as it requires the place of registration to coincide with the place of operational administration. Accordingly, AG Maduro noted that the Hungarian company law restricts 'the "export" of a Hungarian legal person to the territory of another Member State' and this falls within the remit of the freedom of establishment. AG Maduro argued that although Member States were entitled to create their national company laws in the light of incorporation or the real seat theories, 'freedom of establishment required a minimum degree of mutual recognition and coordination of these various systems of rules so that neither could be applied to its fullest extent'. However, the ECJ held that should a company break off the connecting factor, the right of establishment could not be invoked against the loss of its legal identity. It relied on the reasoning in Daily Mail and noted that company's entitlement to the freedom of establishment can only be determined by applicable national law and a Member State has a power not to allow a company governed under its law to maintain its legal status if company intends to transfer its connecting factor to another Member State. Nevertheless, the ECJ complemented this statement by giving an example of a different situation in which this power is restricted. In particular, when a company intends to move to another Member State "with an attendant change as regards the national law applicable", Home State is prohibited to require the liquidation of the company based on its national law. It found that this type of actual conversion of the company would fall within the ambit of freedom of establishment to the extent that the law of Host State allows such conversion.

The judgment made in Cartesio case resulted in controversial discussions among legal scholars, as it subjected the transfer of company's real seat to international private law (incorporation or real seat theories) of Member States, which differs from each other and consequently, brings about various outcomes with regard to the right of establishment. According to Gerner-Beuerle and Schilling, the criteria employed by the ECJ to determine the remit of articles 49 and 54 of the TFEU cause "arbitrary results and lack of intrinsic justification". They have made an analysis of the transfer of company's real seat or registered seat cases in the light of incorporation and real seat theories of Home and Host States. The results of this case-by-case analysis revealed that: a) If a company intends to transfer its real seat from incorporation theory Home State, dissolution is not required, but if it transfers from the real seat theory Home State, it is subject to dissolution; b) If a company wishes to transfer its registered seat only with the change of its applicable law, Home State is not entitled to restrict such conversion by dissolution requirement, but what matters is the law of Host State. If Host State follows the incorporation theory, it may require reincorporation of the company depending on its law, which does not infringe the Articles 49, 54. However, transfer of registered seat to the real seat theory State leads to a vague result. Since the issue of whether the transfer of seat and conversion without liquidation is allowed is an area addressed by substantive law, the applicable law is determined by private international law. The real seat theory State determines applicable law based on the location of company's real seat, which is the State of incorporation that releases company from dissolution by referring to the law of Host State. Thus, rules created by the ECJ result in "circular argument".

Later, the situation of company's conversion into a legal form of another Member State was considered in Vale case, the judgment of which shifted the case law concerning the corporate mobility in favour of companies. Vale Costruzioni Srl. (VS) was an Italian company, which applied to transfer its real seat as well as registered seat with an attendant change in its applicable law to Hungary as a legal successor of VS. Although this application was approved by Italian authorities, the Hungarian Court rejected to register the new Hungarian company VALE Építési as "the successor in law" of Italain company VS based on its national company law which did not allow such conversion. Consequently, the Hungarian Supreme Court asked the ECJ for the preliminary ruling regarding the question whether this type of conversion falls within the ambit of freedom of establishment, if so, to what extent Hungarian company law can be applied in adjudicating on the application for registration. The ECJ held that Hungarian law was in breach of company's right of establishment. However, if the judgment in Cartesio was followed, a different outcome could be expected. It was stated in an obiter dictum of the judgment that conversion with an attendant change was subject to the legislation of Host State where the company was supposed to re-incorporate. Nevertheless, the Court inferred from the hypothetical case in Cartesio, which authorized companies for cross-border conversions within the ambit of the freedom of establishment and refined its judgment by imposing non-discrimination requirement on Host States and concluded that 'national legislation which enables national companies to convert, but does not allow companies governed by the law of another Member State to do so, falls within the scope of Articles 49 TFEU and 54 TFEU.' Moreover, a company is obliged to comply with the conditions of incorporation under the law of Host State before acquiring its nationality. Thus, the judgment in Vale granted a greater freedom to companies to choose a company law under which they wish to operate.

The judgment in SEVIC Systems case added a new element to EU case law concerning the protection of cross-border mergers under the freedom of establishment. Security Vision Concept (SVC) was a company established in Luxemburg, which intended to merge into a German company, SEVIC Systems AG (SEVIC), by method of acquisition. German law required mergers to be registered in the commercial register at the relevant place of incorporation of both absorbing and absorbed company. Since only one of the companies was located in Germany, SEVIC sought to register it at its place of incorporation. However, local court rejected the application for registration based on German law on transformations, which was designed only for domestic mergers. SEVIC appealed to German High Court, which asked for preliminary ruling about the question whether cross-border mergers can be considered as an "establishment" within the meaning of Articles 43 ,48 (TEC) and if so, does the lack of provisions of German law allowing cross-border mergers constitute a restriction on the freedom of establishment. As regards the right of establishment, the ECJ stated that 'the right of establishment covers all measures which permit or merely facilitate access to another Member State […] by allowing the persons to participate in the economic life of the country effectively and under the same conditions as national operators' and noted that since cross-border merger projects satisfy the needs for collaboration and consolidation between corporations incorporated in different Member State, they are important for effective operation of internal market and therefore, constitute a particular type of "establishment". With respect to German law, it found that when a merger with a foreign company participation is treated differently compared to that of domestic one, it constitutes a restriction on the right of establishment regardless of whether this treatment comes from the Member State of the acquiring company or the Member State of the acquired company. Thus, the freedom of establishment was supposed to cover both inward and outward mergers.

The ECJ stressed the freedom to choose the most suitable organizational structure in the Saint-Gobain Case by confirming that companies can freely choose an appropriate legal form for their economic activities in another Member State under the freedom of establishment principle. Previously, the ECJ addressed the freedom of choice concerning legal forms of transnational establishments in the avoir fiscal judgement. This case involved French tax law which provided shareholders of domestic companies (with a French subsidiary) with tax credits on distributed dividends while leaving foreign companies with French subsidiary subject to the full company tax. The Commission argued that tax provisions in question amounted to "an indirect restriction" on the choice of corporations relating to the form of establishment (branch or subsidiary). The ECJ held that this provision was a discriminatory treatment that violated the principles of the freedom of establishment.

The freedom of establishment relating to choice of organizational structure was developed by the judgments of subsequent cases. In Centros case, Centros Ltd was established by two Danish nationals under UK law, in order to take advantage of UK's company law and to avoid minimum capital requirement imposed by Danish law. It sought to conduct all its business operations in Denmark by setting up a branch there but registration of the branch was refused by Danish authorities based on the reasoning that it was an abuse of freedom of establishment and unlawful way of national law evasion. However, AG La Pergola highlighted the right of Centros Ltd to choose legal form of its establishment by setting a branch or a subsidiary and argued that since a subsidiary would be an independent entity separate from its parent company, it would be subject to national law (including minimum capital requirement) and therefore rejection of the registration amounted to a restriction on the freedom of choice concerning form of establishment. The ECJ held that since the incorporation of a company in a State 'whose rules of company law seem the least restrictive and to set up branches in other Member States' is considered to be inherent right in the TFEU, the action of Centros Ltd could not be an abuse of law. Although this judgment extended the scope of freedom of establishment, it severely restricted the competence of States over overseas corporations especially those following the real seat theory.

In conclusion, despite particular uncertainties and incoherencies of EU case law on the freedom of establishment and incorporation theories, it extended the scope of the freedom of establishment principle to a great extent, thereby enabling MNEs to realize various cross-border objectives. Firstly, it facilitates "shopping" for corporate law by authorizing MNEs to choose their place of incorporation and nationality; secondly, it provides protection for both inbound and outbound transnational mergers; and lastly, it entitles them to choose the most appropriate organizational structure for their cross-border establishments.

As regards, the transfer of a registered seat and real seat, there are still uncertainties for certain cases due to the application of international private law such as incorporation and real seat theories. For example, a company like in Polybud case could be rejected by the real seat theory Host State. Thus, these areas of EU case law could be resolved by future cases or a Uniform Community Law.
